Proposed new legislation to help boost organ donation is ethically unacceptable and risks reducing the number of transplants that can take place, MSPs have been warned.

The Scottish Council on Human Bioethics (SCHB) has highlighted its concerns about the Human Tissue (Authorisation) (Scotland) Bill, which would move Scotland to a system of presuming consent for donation.

The ethics body claims the organs of up to one million Scots could be removed for transplantation after their death against their will – if legislation is passed in its current form.

Plans to change the donation system have been under discussion at the Scottish Parliament's Health and Sport Committee.

From an ethical perspective, the present Bill is completely unacceptable.

Dr Calum MacKellar, the SCHB's director of research, said a situation where organs are removed without consent from those who have died could be considered as "abusive and exploitative by the general public" and "give rise to serious scandal".

He added: "This could eventually undermine trust in the system, thereby reducing the number of organs available.

"The SCHB very much supports, and is fully committed to, increasing the number of donated organs from the deceased for lifesaving transplants.

"However from an ethical perspective, the present Bill is completely unacceptable.

"Of course it is very important to save lives, but this should only be done in an ethical manner."

In the committee's report on the Bill at Stage 1, it said the views of potential donors would be considered.
